In the quiet depths of an ancient forest, where sunlight filters through emerald canopies and dances upon mossy stones, there exists a legend—a tale whispered by the wind itself. It speaks of Titiel, the guardian spirit of forgotten dreams.

Titiel is neither human nor beast but something in between: a luminous figure cloaked in shifting shadows, with eyes that shimmer like starlight on water. They are said to wander the woods at twilight, collecting fragments of abandoned hopes and unspoken desires. Each fragment glows faintly within their translucent hands, pulsing softly like fireflies caught mid-flight.

The villagers who live near this enchanted place call it "Titiel's Hour," for it is during the fleeting moments between dusk and nightfall when the air grows heavy with magic. Those brave enough—or perhaps desperate enough—venture into the forest seeking Titiel's guidance. Some come burdened by regret, others yearning for clarity or solace. And though few ever truly see them, those who do speak of a
